the Council on Foreign Relations (1921). All shared a similar objective: to develop, in the face of America's isolationism, an informed, articulate audience for "enlightened" international policies, which meant, in the 1920s and '30s, collective security and the League of Nations. Their approach included network building, widely circulated publications, and a seemingly endless series of meetings, seminars, and luncheons.

The strategy worked. By the late 1930s a strong political foundation had been laid for the increasingly open internationalist policies pursued by Franklin Roosevelt.

The interwar success of these foreign policy organizations was matched by a string of postwar successes. In the late 1940s and throughout the '50s these organizations proved crucial in constructing the cold war consensus about America's global military and economic obligations. In the 1970s they focused efforts among policy-makers and much of the public upon recognizing and responding to the changing international environment, to shifts in power among U.S. allies and adversaries, to the rising significance of economics, environment, and energy, and to the emergence of a North-South axis in international relations.

Wallace Irwin's America in the World belongs to these recent efforts. Sponsored by the Foreign Policy Association (where Irwin served as editor from 1976 to 1980), the book's objective is educational; it attempts to draw for the general reader a quick map of America's foreign policy terrain.

Though at times frustratingly sketchy, the book manages to construct a solid beginner's framework for understanding the often "bewildering" global scene. Part I focuses on the United States. It looks first at the fundamentals of the international system of which this country is a part—in particular the general characteristics and goals of the national actors central to it. The section goes on to present an excellent outline of the historical record, beginning with the colonists, and ends with a more conventional, but still useful, view of the country's principal foreign policy institutions.

Parts II and III focus on the international environment, on the regional concerns of Europe, Northeast Asia, the Third World, and the Western Hemisphere, and on such substantive issues as war, peace, human rights, economics, ecology, and world order. Again, the view is conventional but useful.

Irwin's final chapter is his best. His framework fully in place, he sets out a series of insights about foreign policy practice that are not only short, simple, and wise, but relevant to professional and amateur alike. About "getting the facts," for example, Irwin writes:

"We all tend to select (or let somebody else select for us) those facts that fit a familiar pattern and confirm our opinions and hunches. Especially in a field as full of ambiguity as foreign policy, it is important to leave room in our minds for surprising facts and ideas—those that upset our preconceptions and make us think in new ways about familiar problems, or open our minds to unfamiliar ones."

Still, despite the book's admittedly modest aims and many achievements, something is missing. The problem lies in the discussion of the foreign policy process. Moving in an orderly fashion from harried president, to unresponsive bureaucracy, to meddlesome Congress, to inconsistently active public, the discussion tends to treat the process as largely distinct from its domestic policy counterpart. This is a problem common to much of the work of America's nonpartisan foreign policy organizations. Perhaps ten, and certainly twenty or thirty, years ago, such a description would have sufficed. No longer.

The fact is that domestic policies no longer stop at the water's edge. Sitting at the international table, once reserved for a fairly predictable set of actors, is a host of new, and often uninvited, guests. They bring new concerns and interests as well as new ways of achieving their objectives. Today, for example, state governors battle missile deployments, mayors pursue export policies, congressional subcommittee chairmen cut deals with foreign governments, and voters cast ballots on nuclear freezes.

In short, foreign policy calls for understanding and skills quite unlike those developed over the years by America's progressive foreign policy community. By failing to recognize this changing domestic dimension of the U.S. foreign policy process, the community risks irrelevance—however important its analysis of foreign policy's changing external dimension.

THE GREAT FRONTIER: FREEDOM AND HIERARCHY IN MODERN TIMES

by William H. McNeill

(Princeton University Press; 71 pp.; $13.95)

Kalman Goldstein

This slim volume by a master of world history is a distillation of McNeill's research and writing on human civilization and a further contribution to his argument against a microworld, or parochial, focus. In two essays, originally the Charles Edmundson Lectures at Baylor University for 1982, the author criticizes American claims to uniqueness and the Turner thesis of frontier democracy. For McNeill, global frontiers are better characterized by social hierarchy and constraining contacts with the "mother" culture than by anarchic freedom or pioneer equality.

Historically, says McNeill, change has embodied challenge and response; and it is violence and displacement, epidemiological onslaught, cultural differentiations, and struggles for dominance that have shaped the frontier. Whether enforcing military sanctions against an encountered "enemy" or replacing a decimated population with a subject labor force (slave, serf, peasant, or indentured), frontier societies have extended old hierarchies or created new ones. These lead to, or are complemented by, graded hierarchies based on material success or on the ability to link the new communities to their civilized base. Thus the Spanish encomendero, the French Canadian seigneur, and Virginia's sons of English squires quickly brought a "slender simulacrum of European polite society" to the wilderness. Even the mountain men were incipient entrepreneurs tied umbilically to the provincial gentry, who, in turn, were economically and psychologically the shadow of the European elite.

In trying in such a brief volume to illustrate his thesis with examples from several cultures and epochs, McNeill runs the risk not only of truncated presentations and jar-
Be prepared too to wonder at what McNeill does not discuss: societal values based in part on such nonmaterial achievements as saintliness and successes not dependent upon coerced or manipulated labor. McNeill also does not sufficiently weigh the differences in caste or deference structures between the cultural base and its frontier. He gives attention to cultural differentiations far more than to cultural syntheses: How did the confrontation of races and cultures produce the frontier "creole"?

Fundamental to McNeill's thesis is a critique of Frederick Jackson Turner and his disciple Walter Prescott Webb. One gets the impression from this work that McNeill is doing battle with a still vigorous, even dominant example of the American provincialism he so frequently deplores. But, save in a few stalwart hearts and minds, the Turner thesis has long been supplanted.

 centralamerica week, march 18-28, 1984: a week of worship, education and action which incorporates the commemoration of the death of Salvadoran Archbishop Oscar Romero, March 24. The week will be a time for the religious community to join together to work for peace in Central America. In addition to local activities, there will be two national events during the week. At the National Religious Convocation, March 19, leaders of the religious community and concerned people of faith will come together in Washington, D.C., in prayerful witness for peace and justice in Central America. On March 20, the National Day of Advocacy, everyone is encouraged to go to Washington, D.C., to meet with their legislators and urge an end to U.S. intervention in the region. For more information, or to order resource packets ($3.00 each, available January), please contact: Inter-Religious Task Force on El Salvador and Central America, 475 Riverside Drive, Room 633, New York, NY 10011.

ASSOCIATIONS

SOCIOMETRY SAYS: "Society is a technical problem." Conventional approaches create only havoc. Let's start over! THE LEAGUE OF REASONS, Box 327W, Patton, PA 15239.

CORRESPONDENCE

Oriental penfriends seek literate correspondents. Cherry Blossoms, Box 1021WV, Honolulu, HI 96727.

CLASSIFIEDS

ANNOUNCEMENTS

CENTRAL AMERICA WEEK, MARCH 18-28, 1984: A week of worship, education and action which incorporates the commemoration of the death of Salvadoran Archbishop Oscar Romero, March 24. The week will be a time for the religious community to join together to work for peace in Central America. In addition to local activities, there will be two national events during the week. At the National Religious Convocation, March 19, leaders of the religious community and concerned people of faith will come together in Washington, D.C., in prayerful witness for peace and justice in Central America. On March 20, the National Day of Advocacy, everyone is encouraged to go to Washington, D.C., to meet with their legislators and urge an end to U.S. intervention in the region. For more information, or to order resource packets ($3.00 each, available January), please contact: Inter-Religious Task Force on El Salvador and Central America, 475 Riverside Drive, Room 633, New York, NY 10011.

MISCELLANEOUS

CENTRAL AMERICA WEEK, MARCH 18-28, 1984: A week of worship, education and action which incorporates the commemoration of the death of Salvadoran Archbishop Oscar Romero, March 24. The week will be a time for the religious community to join together to work for peace in Central America. In addition to local activities, there will be two national events during the week. At the National Religious Convocation, March 19, leaders of the religious community and concerned people of faith will come together in Washington, D.C., in prayerful witness for peace and justice in Central America. On March 20, the National Day of Advocacy, everyone is encouraged to go to Washington, D.C., to meet with their legislators and urge an end to U.S. intervention in the region. For more information, or to order resource packets ($3.00 each, available January), please contact: Inter-Religious Task Force on El Salvador and Central America, 475 Riverside Drive, Room 633, New York, NY 10011.

ASSOCIATIONS

SOCIOMETRY SAYS: "Society is a technical problem." Conventional approaches create only havoc. Let's start over! THE LEAGUE OF REASONS, Box 327W, Patton, PA 15239.

CORRESPONDENCE

Oriental penfriends seek literate correspondents. Cherry Blossoms, Box 1021WV, Honolulu, HI 96727.

OPPORTUNITIES

EDITOR SEeks ARTICLES ON FILM lore, history. Write: Cinema, 1612 NW Alta Drive, Corvallis, OR 97330.

PUBLICATIONS

THE PEOPLE: America's oldest socialist newspaper. Biweekly news, commentary for working people. Since 1891. Four months: $1.00; one year: $4.00. The People (WV), 914 Industrial Avenue, Palo Alto, CA 94303.

RELIGION

TRUE BUDDHISM: The Future Religion. For information, send $2.00 to Harman, 948 Seventh Street, #6, Santa Monica, CA 90403.

BIBLICAL ERRANCY—Free Copy. 23 Pay Drive, Dept WV, Eton, OH 45323.

SERVICES

OUT OF PRINT Bookfinders. Send wants. 2035 WV-Everding, Eureka, CA 95501.

---

CLASSIFIEDS

FINANCIAL OPPORTUNITIES

EDITOR SAYS: THE LEAGUE OF REALITY, 301 E. 64 Street, New York, N.Y. 10021.

---

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Insertion Rates</th>
<th>Display Rates</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1 time $5c per word</td>
<td>1 time $22 per column inch</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3 times $5c per word</td>
<td>3 times $20 per column inch</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6 times $5c per word</td>
<td>6 times $18 per column inch</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12 times $5c per word</td>
<td>12 times $16 per column inch</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

There is a 12-word minimum for all ads. All ads must be prepaid. Ads are accepted at Editor's discretion. Telephone numbers count as two words, as do box numbers. ZIP code counts as one word.

Please make all checks payable to Worldview and send to Worldview Classifieds, 170 E. 64 Street, New York, N.Y. 10021.

---

Payment enclosed of $________ for words to run ________ times
Payment enclosed of $________, for display of _______ size (I have enclosed photo-ready copy). To run ______ times

IMPORTANT: Ads are not acknowledged. Tearsheets sent only upon request. WORLDVIEW is published monthly. Closing date is the first of the month one month prior to issue date. Issue printed 3 weeks after closing date. Late entries appear in next available issue. Please print clearly in spaces provided or type on separate sheet. One space for each letter, space, or punctuation (leave one space after each period or comma). To insure readability, please use proper word breaks at the end of lines, use periods after abbreviations. use commas in series and addresses.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Print name</th>
<th>Address</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

City State Zip

Telephone Signature

Signature must be provided